"Simply put, Systems We Have Loved is a gorgeous discussion of art, ideas, and their intercourse. But it is the tangible patience, care, and aptness of Eve Meltzer's own language that bring about the book's specific and considerable accomplishment: here is a successful and nuanced reawakening of the fervent optimism that, surprisingly, engendered some of the 'coolest' art produced under the rubric of conceptualism."

Conceptual Art, Affect, and the Antihumanist Turn Eve Meltzer University of Chicago Press ($45) by Pablo Lopez. There's something immediately off-putting in the title of Eve Meltzer's book, Systems We Have Loved: Conceptual Art, Affect, and the Antihumanist Turn. Uncomfortably, Meltzer's title implicates the reader in loving systems—but aren't systems the problem, something to resist if not oppose outright?

SYSTEMS WE HAVE LOVED | Rain Taxi

Eve Meltzer's Systems We Have Loved: Conceptual Art, Affect, and the Antihumanist Turn returns readers to the structuralist adventure in art history. To recall something of the stakes and texture of that adventure, consider the following exchange in 1976 between Robert Morris, an artist, and A. A., a blind woman hired to assist him with a series of drawings entitled Blind Time II.
